What Is a Child Victim First Principle Approach?

Come with curiosity. Think of this as an open invitation, a chance to connect with the human heart. Learning what a Child Victim First Principle Approach is might be one of the most meaningful steps you take in this work. It's a gentle way of seeing. It asks you to remember that many people in the adult carceral system were first harmed as children, and that what happened to that child really matters.

A person first, not a file. When you sit with someone's story, see the person first, never just a file. This approach supports trauma-informed work with people who were harmed as children and grew up inside the adult system. Take in the whole story, with care, and hold off on conclusions until you can see the full picture.

A neutral, open perspective. Come to each story with an open, neutral heart. Notice what you know, and be honest about what you don't. Please don't fill in the gaps with guesses. Being neutral doesn't mean being cold. It means staying open, steady, and fair while you learn.

The beauty of trauma resilience. You'll often find that people who survived harm as children carry so much strength, creativity, and hope. Resilience isn't the absence of pain. It's the quiet, beautiful ways people keep growing, caring, and reaching toward healing. So when you name what someone needs, name their strengths just as clearly.

Honor their own intelligence. Remember, each person is the expert on their own life. Many have spent years making sense of what happened to them. Honor that wisdom. You're not here to define their story for them. You're here to support them in telling it in their own words.

Listen first. Let their voice lead. Ask, then really listen. Let them correct you, and thank them when they do. Use their words wherever you can. And when childhood harm comes up, speak of it gently and only in broad terms, never in graphic detail.

Consent and choice are always theirs. Nothing gets shared without their clear, written yes. They choose who sees their story. They can ask for changes, and they can change their mind at any time, with no penalty at all. Their voice leads, always.

Understanding the words. So much of this approach lives in its language. Take a moment to sit with each phrase: person first, not a file; a neutral, open perspective; the beauty of trauma resilience; honoring their own intelligence; listen first; consent and choice are always theirs. These aren't just labels. They carry real weight. When you understand them fully, and on purpose, this stops being a document and becomes a practice. And please, help others understand these words too. When the meaning is clear, this becomes something people can truly live by.

Quality of life. This work is about so much more than any one case. It's about quality of life, for the people whose stories we hold and for everyone connected to them. A Child Victim First Principle Approach matters for families, for communities, and for the people doing this work alongside them. Think of it as a supportive guide, not a finished answer. You're always welcome to expand it, put it in your own words, and shape it to fit the people and places you serve.

Sara Kruzan does not have a law degree and is not an attorney. This is volunteer, educational information only, not legal advice, and anything shared using this document is not protected by attorney-client privilege or any other legal protection.

This document may be drafted and assisted with AI/SI tools and verification.